“The World Food Programme has been delivering food to 10,000 people a day for the last week. It’s a 10- day ration for the people that have fled fighting in this part of eastern Congo. But the great hope is that within 10 days, it will be safe enough for people to go home and be self-reliant again, but for the time being, this is the emergency food that they need.”

“The people that the World Food Programme is really concerned about, at the moment, are the people we’re unable to reach because of the insecurity in the area. These people, in many ways, are the lucky ones. We’ve been able to reach them with emergency rations. We’re looking at every possible way to get into the worst affected areas, by plane even if necessary, but for the time being, all we can do is hope to get access in the very near future.”
